There were endemic conflicts among civil, military and financial officials in the vilayet of Baghdad throughout the reign of Abdulhamid II. These had several motives and reasons: political, social, ideological, financial, or personal. The Ottoman central administration could not find permanent solutions to these chronic conflicts among high-ranking officials. To give an example, the case of Nusret Paşa would be mentioned. Generally speaking, the government of the vilayet of Baghdad rested upon a delicate balance between the Vali, the Müşir of 6th Army, and the local notables. In addition, the Sultan’s decision to appoint a former confidant Nusret Paşa, as the Honorary Inspector of 6th Army, provoked a long-lasting, and in some ways, unique crisis in the administration of Baghdad.

Müşir Nusret Paşa, whose nickname was "mad" (delt), had come to Baghdad as an ‘honorary exile’ in 1888. He was a Circassian by birth, and one of the last surviving statesmen from the era of Mahmud II. Exceptionally, his removal to Baghdad was not the result of opposition to the Sultan’s policies, or of doubts about his loyalty. On the contrary, as a typical member of the ‘old school’ of Tanzimat men, Nusret was very loyal to the Sultan and his regime. Moreover, he was quite religious and a former arch-enemy of Midhat Paşa, which was an advantage in the eyes of the Sultan, who, up to 1886, had happily used Nusret in important domestic and foreign missions. That said, Nusret’s

1 For Nusret Paşa, see Sicill-i Osmani, IV, p.554 [cf. pp.870-71]; Türk Ansiklopedisi, XXV, pp.353-54; Public Record Office [PRO], Foreign Office [FO], 195/1794, no.21, 22 May 1893, by Chermside, the Military Attaché.

quarrelsomeness, and his resort to ‘jurnals’ or denunciations of rivals, had made him very unpopular even among Abdulhamid’s own entourage. The last nail in his coffin came in 1886, when in the course of a mission to Iran, Nusret offered the Shah an alliance against the British, to be formed by the Ottomans, Iranians and Russians. He did so without the knowledge of the Porte, or even, it appears, of the Sultan. This was enough for Abdulhamid. Nusret Paşa was sent first to 4th Army, and then to Baghdad as Honorary Inspector of 6th Army.

From late 1890 onwards, complaints began to reach Istanbul, about and from Nusret Paşa. Those containing complaints about Nusret Paşa were sent either by senior provincial officials or by the notables of Baghdad. In turn, Nusret Paşa began to send lengthy reports to Istanbul, complaining about high-ranking government officials, including the Vali and the Defterdar. The core of the matter was land. It appears that since his arrival, Nusret Paşa had been using his post to acquire a great amount of land in and around Baghdad, by legal or illegal means. This seems to have shaken the balance of power in the vilayet, and given the fact that Nusret Paşa was already a potential troublemaker, with his tough manners and singular character, he was proclaimed persona-non-grata by the government officials and local notables. The result was a protracted feud, which ended only with Nusret Paşa’s death in 1896.

At first, Nusret Paşa complained that provincial officials, including the Vali and the Defterdar, were preventing the peasants (fellah) employed by him from working on his land. The Porte’s investigation, in December 1890, showed that this was not the case, and that on the contrary, Nusret Paşa himself had committed several injustices. The Grand Vizier, Kamil Paşa, asked the Sultan for his removal. Nothing was done, however, and in the meantime the duel of letters, complaints and accusations between Nusret Paşa and other officials of Baghdad grew steadily more intense. There were complaints, from January 1891 onwards, that Nusret Paşa had occupied certain waqf lands, beaten some officials, and interfered in the affairs of the provincial administration. For example, in January 1891, it was reported from Baghdad that Nusret Paşa occupied the land of Ummu’l-Uzma belonging to a waqf for poor Armenians in Baghdad. His immediate withdrawal was demanded. The Porte ordered the Commander of Gendarmerie, to halt Nusret Paşa’s occupation of the above-mentioned land. When the Commander began to carry out this order, he was cursed and beaten by Nusret Paşa, in his office, in front of all his staff. In late February, the Grand Vizier again asked the Sultan to dismiss Nusret Paşa as Inspector of 6th Army, due to latter’s outrageous (edebi mugayir) behaviour.

In June 1891, as the result of a report by Committee of Military Investigation, which warned of an imminent threat from the growing Shi‘i population in Iraq, Abdulhamid dismissed Sırrı Paşa, the Vali. The Grand Vizier objected that it was neither just nor understandable to dismiss Sırrı Paşa, instead of dismissing Nusret Paşa, and that the population at large would react badly. Abdulhamid replied that, although Nusret Paşa’s allegations against the Vali were not given any credence, he had lost his confidence in Sırrı Paşa, due to reports about Shi‘i expansion in the region. As Sırrı Paşa’s successor, Abdulhamid chose a former Vali of Baghdad (1879-1880), Abdurrahman Paşa, who, however, declined to accept the post. Instead, the Sultan appointed Hacı Hasan Refik Paşa, who was known for his pious character.

6th Army. However, Abdulhamid also ordered Nusret Paşa to be transferred to Aleppo. In reply, Nusret Paşa thanked the Sultan, and even asked that his salary and allowances be given from the treasury of Aleppo. But, owing to an impending court case about a piece of land he had purchased, involving a person called Mirza Musa, Nusret Paşa had to stay in Baghdad for the time being.

Meanwhile, Nusret Paşa continued to send telegrams to the Porte regarding the internal and external affairs of the vilayet, making some false allegations. For example, he once reported that the Iranian Army was concentrating on the border. He also alleged that, together with the Iranian Ebu’l Fazi Mirza, the Naqibu’l Ashraf and the Naib of Baghdad were spoiling the morality of the people (halkın ahlakını ifsad). But after some investigation, the Grand Vizier, Cevad Paşa, reached the conclusion that these allegations were mere products of animosity.

Like his predecessor, the new Vali, Hasan Refik Paşa, also continued to demand Nusret Paşa’s removal from Baghdad, accusing him of causing disorder in the vilayet. In July 1892, when the Grand Vizier forwarded one of the Vali’s telegrams to the Sultan, Abdulhamid replied that "given [Nusret Paşa’s] character and disposition, it is evident that wherever he is sent he will behave in the same unreasonable manner." He finally ordered that, while the Vali, Hasan Paşa, should be instructed to get on well with Nusret Paşa, at least to some extent, Nusret Paşa should be given a strong warning not to interfere in Meanwhile, new conflicts in the vilayet administration appeared on the scene, this time between the new Vali of Baghdad, Hasan Refik Paşa, and the Commander of Gendarmerie. Upon the request of the Porte, each sent their own version of the matter. After examining these reports, the Council of Ministers decided that the Commander should be transferred to another province, and the Vali be given an admonition. See BOA. Y.A.Hus. 258/98.

the affairs of the provincial government, as he had no right or authority whatsoever in this respect, and should keep quiet.16

The Grand Vizier Paşa questioned this decision, reminding Abdulhamid that the Vali had reported that Nusret Paşa was provoking tension between the Sunnis and the Shi’is in the vilayet, and revealing that the Iranian Ambassador to the Porte had made similar complaints. Cevad Paşa urged that Nusret Paşa should be transferred to Aleppo, and that the government should buy up the land he acquired in Baghdad.17 Abdulhamid declined to follow this advice, urging that it was scarcely credible that Nusret Paşa was trying to bring about a collision between the Sunnis and Shi’is. Instead, he ordered that Nusret Paşa’s son, Muzaffer Bey, one of the aides-de-camp of the Grand Vizier, should be sent to Baghdad to investigate the allegations against his father, and to study the political situation in the vilayet.18

Towards the end of July 1892, Cevad Paşa forwarded two further telegrams of complaint about Nusret Paşa, one from Sayyid Abdurrahman Efendi al-Gaylani, the brother of the Naqib, and one from a certain Abdulkadir, a landlord (mallak), both reporting fresh aggressions by Nusret Paşa and his men. Abdulhamid’s attention was drawn to the words of “his men” in these statements, and he asked for an investigation. The response of the vilayet showed that, generally, Nusret Paşa committed the acts of aggression on his own, but that, when he was not able to do so, he would employ some notorious person of the city and his aides from the army for this kind of job. A list of their names was also forwarded to the Porte, together with the reply of the Vali of Baghdad.19 Nusret Paşa, on the other hand, was quick to counter-attack, Later, Abdulhamid replied to the effect that Muzaffer Bey was also charged with looking into this last point concerning the men employed by Nusret Paşa. insisting that the accusations against him were fabrications, and that it was, on the contrary, the Naqib’s family (Dergâh-i Kadiriyye) at Baghdad which was the real troublemaker. Nusret Paşa asserted that the civil administration of Baghdad had fallen under the control of the Naqib and his family (Qadiri tekke of Baghdad), and that the Vali was no more than the instrument of the latter. It appears that Nusret Paşa’s hatred of the Naqib’s family partly stemmed from a quarrel over a certain piece of land. Later, in September 1892, he sent another telegram to the Palace, arguing that due to the harmful results of the influence of this family, especially with regard to their land case, a special commission should be sent to the region, for the sake of the future of Iraq. Upon this, Abdulhamid reiterated that, as Inspector of 6th Army, Nusret had nothing to do with the civil affairs of the vilayet. He should keep quiet, and not cause any trouble, or interfere into the affairs of local government.20

Sultan Abdulhamid, however, appears to have disbelieved Nusret Paşa’s allegations about the Naqib’s family. He commented that Nusret Paşa had never been on good terms with any of the Valis of Baghdad, and that all this was because of Nusret Paşa’s belief that he would be summoned back to Istanbul if he caused enough trouble to the local authorities. He suggested that the best way to thwart Nusret Paşa’s purposes would be to pay no attention to him. Abdulhamid instructed that a strong warning once again should be given to Nusret Paşa “by way of wisdom”, to make sure that he would not cause any more harm in the future.21 For reasons which are unclear, however, Abdulhamid soon changed his mind: he decided that Hüsnü Bey, the newly-appointed Judicial Inspector of Baghdad, should join Muzaffer Bey in conducting as to what to do with Nusret Paşa.22

Nusret Paşa, however, was not defenceless. While the two investigators were still on their way to Baghdad, he sent a telegram directly to the Sultan, complaining that the Vali had become a tool in the hands of Sayyid Abdurrahman Efendi of the Naqib’s Family and of Kethudazâde Suleyman Faik Bey, a prominent notable of Baghdad, who served as the Chief Secretary to the Vali (Mektubcu). He demanded that a full committee of investigation should be sent to Baghdad as quickly as possible. The outbreak of a quarrel between the Vali and Recep Paşa, the Müşir of 6th Army, played further into Nusret's hands. In a message to the Grand Vizier, the Müşir echoed Nusret Paşa's charge that the Vali was being provoked by the Chief Secretary, Süleyman Faik Bey. As a result, Faik Bey was transferred to Diyarbakır.

Finally, Nusret discovered that one of the two officials sent to investigate him, Hüsnü Bey, was a relative of the Public Prosecutor of Baghdad, Mahmud Bey, and objected that he would not get a fair hearing. The Grand Vizier was inclined to endorse this objection, and in any case, questioned whether it was wise to appoint members of the same family to the posts of Public Prosecutor and Judicial Inspector at Baghdad. The Justice Minister disagreed, pointing out that Muzaffer Bey, the other investigator, was Nusret Paşa's own son, and that it would be unfair to transfer or dismiss Hüsnü Bey, who had committed no offence. Abdulhamid backed the Justice Minister, reasoning that: "It is my Imperial demand that the courts be independent, and that judicial officials possess the necessary qualities, and the responsibility for this belongs to the Ministry of Justice. Therefore, Hüsnü Efendi [sic] for the time being should stay in his post."

Kayahan Özdil, Ali Ekrem Bolayır'ın Hataları, (İstanbul: Kültür Bakanlığı, 1991), p.192, for the independence of justice system under Abdulhamid. In the course of its investigations, the Porte sometimes revised its decisions. In January 1893, for example, Cevad Paşa, upon the request of the Inspector of Justice of Baghdad, proposed to the Sultan that it would be better to include the Naib and the Defterdar in the investigation committee, for they had intimate knowledge of the case. This was accepted by Abdulhamid. See Irade-Hususi, no.8, 3 Receb 1310-21 Ocak 1893.
Muzaffer Bey and Hüsnü Bey completed their investigations and submitted their report in May 1893.\(^{27}\) Their report has not been traced, but whatever their recommendations, it appears that no action was taken against Nusret Paşa, who remained in Baghdad, and continued to pursue his vendetta with the Vali and other local officials. For example, in June 1893, in one of his dispatches to the Porte, Nusret repeated his claims that it was urgent and necessary to institute reforms in Iraq in order to stop the misconduct of civil and military officials, praising Ömer Vehbi Paşa for his harsh actions in Mosul. According to Nusret Paşa it was very unfortunate that while Ömer Vehbi Paşa was making progress, he was stopped because of certain false accusations. He finally asked that a similar kind of reform mission be sent to Baghdad.\(^{28}\) In September 1893, the Vali reported that, while visiting the tomb of Imam Musa al-Kazım at Kazırnayn, Nusret Paşa had threatened the Kilidar and the Hademe of the tomb, on the grounds that the Sultan’s name had been mentioned in the prayers there. Abdulhamid promptly objected that it was a customary act to mention the Sultan’s name in the prayers at that tomb, and it should continue to be so. He asked the Grand Vizier to issue a strong warning to Nusret Paşa about his behaviour, which by no means corresponded with "devotion and servitude" (süd ve ubüdiyet).\(^{29}\)

This warning appears to have made no impression, as the troubles he caused continued as ever. In early October 1893, a telegram reached the Porte from some landowners of Baghdad, saying that Nusret Paşa was confiscating and occupying their lands. Cevad Paşa repeated that this growing conflict between Nusret Paşa and the Vali would disrupt civil and military affairs. When the Vali of Baghdad was asked about this, he confirmed the situation and provided details.\(^{30}\) Towards the end of October, Nusret Paşa took refuge in the office of the Gendarmerie Commander, saying that he was afraid for his life and property and could not go out under the present circumstances. In his instructions, Abdulhamid stated that although there was a state of opposition between the two men, the above-mentioned unreasonable situation was not acceptable. The attention of the Vali should be drawn to this, and also necessary advice should be given to Nusret Paşa through the Serasker. In another example, towards the end of November 1893, justice officials of Baghdad complained about Nusret Paşa to the Porte through the Ministry of Justice, since he prevented them from doing their job, and he did not hand over some suspects. When the Grand Vizier wrote to Nusret Paşa on the issue, Nusret Paşa denied all these "allegations" and himself made some new accusations about the civil officials.

In December 1894, 21 persons of Baghdad sent a telegram to the Porte, complaining that Nusret Paşa had seized their land and property, and levied illegal taxes on them. Simultaneously, another conflict broke out between Nusret Paşa and the Naib of Baghdad, Aziz Bey. These developments finally prompted Abdulhamid to take a decision: Nusret Paşa must be transferred to Aleppo, and there retired on an adequate pension in order to stop his trouble-making. As he explained to the Grand Vizier:

Just as Nusret Paşa behaved in an unsuitable manner when he was in Istanbul, in Baghdad, too, he has thus far not got on well with the Valis. Now he is provoking Recep Paşa, the Commander of 6th Army, against Hacı Hasan Refik Paşa, and by so doing, he is disrupting the administrative affairs of the province. Given Baghdad's obvious regional importance, the continuation of this situation is absolutely impermissible. But it is obvious that Nusret Paşa will not change his conduct, and that even he is summoned back to Istanbul, he will continue his previous conduct.

34 At first, Nusret Paşa sent a telegram to the Meşihat, complaining about Aziz Bey, to which the latter reacted quickly, sending his version of events. See BOA. Irade-Hususi, no.11, 7 Receb 1311-14 Ocak 1894.
35 BOA. Irade-Hususi, no.12 (1), 7 Receb 1311-14 Ocak 1894. The Sultan at the same time reiterated his order that the Council of Ministers should meet to discuss the issue.
Abdulhamid was now determined that Nusret Paşa must leave Baghdad. Nonetheless, incident continued. Later, Nusret Paşa was angry with the officials in the office of justice and finance, because they obstructed his business proceedings. Together with 7-8 armed men, he went to the local government building and reproached the above-mentioned officials. In late February 1894, some notables of Baghdad again telegraphed the Porte for help, after describing Nusret Paşa’s attacks and aggression. In April 1894, Nusret Paşa attacked the Kaymakam of Kazimayn who was then supervising the works on the dams on the Tigris. He was said to have insulted and beaten the Kaymakam, before the workers who were gathered there, consisting of several members of the local tribes. An account of this event was passed to the Porte through the Vali of Baghdad.

At the beginning of May 1894, the Vali of Baghdad complained that Nusret Paşa was still interfering in the administrative affairs of Baghdad, and soon after, an incident in which Nusret Paşa physically assaulted the Defterdar of the vilayet led the Vali, the Naqib and other notables of Baghdad to send a lengthy telegram to the Grand Vizier. Abdulhamid responded by repeating his order that Nusret Paşa be transferred to Aleppo and in July, he asked the Grand Vizier whether Nusret Paşa had left Baghdad for Aleppo or not. But the result of the enquiry was negative; although Nusret Paşa had been given all his salary and a travel allowance, he was still in Baghdad, and causing trouble. The civil authorities were "helpless", and the Commander of 6th Army was therefore asked to repeat the Sultan’s decision to Nusret Paşa and convince him to leave.43 But this had no effect. In the middle of August, Nusret Paşa was still in Baghdad.44 However, the records suggest that from August 1894 onwards, he refrained from causing further trouble.45 Nusret Paşa stayed in Baghdad until his death on 24 November 1896.46

45 From then on, we see no reference to Nusret Paşa in the documents. It is interesting to note that although Nusret Paşa wrote a great deal about the British intrigues in the region, he seems to have got on very well with the British representatives at Baghdad. On his death, Mockler, the Consul-General, wrote the following: "His Excellency during his residence in Baghdad was always on the most friendly terms with this residency and his somewhat sudden death is therefore a cause for much regret."
