

EDITOR'S NOTE

Dear Readers,

We live in times where we painfully realize that knowledge, if not transformed into virtue, cannot lead us to safety. We are ending the year 2023, a year marked by the suffering of an innocent people, the Palestinians, who have been victims of a nearly century-long occupation and subjected to a ruthless genocide. While this unfolds, the hearts of conscientious people bleed in agony, leaving a raw and harsh shame for the rest of humanity. Amidst all this turmoil, we also celebrate the joy of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the Republic of Turkey, a sanctuary for the innocent and oppressed, built with great sacrifices and heroism in Anatolia, the homeland of kind-hearted people. Amidst these emotional tensions, Artuklu Journal of Humanities and Social Sciences continues its scientific journey with determination and persistence, contributing to the amalgamation of knowledge and wisdom, presenting its 15th issue in its eighth year with diverse and high-quality academic texts.

In this issue of our journal, we have prepared articles focusing on various areas and topics in social sciences. Our first article, titled "Mardin Houses: Women's Daily Life Narratives and the Reproduction of Space During the Pandemic", focuses on the pandemic, daily practices, women's narratives, and housing research in Mardin. The following article is an intriguing study examining the traumatic effects of migration, applying logotherapy and migration concepts to Mahir Güven's novel "Big Brother", winner of the Goncourt Academy Award for Best First Novel. In the article titled "An Artist in the Changing World (1986) by Kazuo Ishiguro: Culture as Industry", we see a literary work analyzed in the context of Adorno's 'culture industry'. The subsequent article examines the effects of stress on human health, exploring the relationship between health anxiety and psychological resilience. The last article, titled "Migration Psychology and Migration Trauma: Dissocial Analysis of Developmental Migration as a Transboundary Life Experience", delves into migration psychology from a technical and academic perspective. In the book review section, we introduce "Samiri's Calf", written by Yasin Meral, comparing the story of the calf mentioned in the Torah and the Quran.

That sums up our 15th issue. We owe gratitude to our authors who have crafted these intensive works. We express our thanks and appreciation to the writers who have brought our journal to this day with their academic efforts, and to our readers who follow our journal with interest. We are excited to announce that our journal has been included in several new indexes and eagerly await new articles from our writers.

With heartfelt feelings, we greet you, our valued readers.
